The immune system, particularly the components of the innate immune system, play a key role in the pathogenesis of multiple sclerosis (MS) and other diseases. The innate immune system detects and responds to microbes and other infections via a set of pattern recognition receptors. Toll-like receptors (TLRs) are innate immune system receptors that recognize microbial components and are involved in the induction of inflammatory cytokines and chemokines. TLRs are expressed in a wide variety of cells, including cells within the brain, such as oligodendrocytes, astrocytes, and microglia. Thus, TLRs may play a role in diseases where there is infection or autoimmune attack. There is considerable evidence that inflammatory bowel disease (IBD), a group of inflammatory conditions, shares characteristics of both MS and autoimmune encephalomyelitis, such as multifocal white matter lesions, demyelination, and oligodendrocyte loss. Furthermore, oligodendrocytes express several TLRs, including TLR3 and TLR4, in vitro. TLR4, in particular, may play a role in the pathogenesis of multiple sclerosis by triggering myelin destruction, because it has been found to be up-regulated in MS lesions, and TLR4-deficient mice are protected from the demyelination caused by experimental autoimmune encephalomyelitis. We examined the expression of TLR3 and TLR4 in a cohort of 100 patients with multiple sclerosis, 80 patients with Crohn's disease, and 100 healthy controls. We found that the expression of TLR3 was significantly higher in MS than in controls ($P=0.02$), and that the expression of TLR4 was significantly higher in Crohn's disease than in controls ($P=0.02$). Taken together, our data support the view that a common pathway in the pathogenesis of multiple sclerosis, Crohn's disease and other diseases may include the stimulation of the innate immune system by TLRs. tag:blogger.com,1999:blog-107827724028807298.post1245842452811250795..comments2019-02-21T18:19:34.079-05:00 Comments on At the Foot of the Rose
